Keynote Title: "Uncovering and converting(subconscious) life themes into conscious motivations to enhance 'hope counselling'"

Abstract: The unpredictable and insecure world of work is changing rapidly and fundamentally. Together with the Covid-19 pandemic, global developments have led to numerous job losses, resignations, a move to the country, as well as a search for meaning in life (clarifying existential questions such as "Who am I?", "Why am I living?" and "What is the meaning of my life?"). Career counselling needs to respond to change timeously and innovatively as many people today are experiencing challenges such as lack of fulfillment, disillusionment, lack of meaning in their lives, and trauma in the workplace. These challenges do not define who they are or can become. If they want to – and with the necessary support structures and mechanisms – people have the power and creativity to convert their greatest challenges into opportunities, successes, and social contributions. Humankind has consistently done so throughout the ages. Irrespective of the magnitude of the challenges facing us, we can master actively what we have suffered or are suffering (often passively) and convert unmastered developmental assignments and even major trauma into hope-filled themes. By refusing to look through a lens of despair at our individual and collective (perceived or imaginary) threatened career-life prospects, we can choose to regard constant change as a source of hope and inspiration. This paper explains how career counsellors can elicit and integrate people's 'stories' and 'scores' to help them uncover and convert (subconscious) life themes into conscious motivations to enhance 'hope counselling'. Counsellors can enact this strategy compassionately in affluent as well as impoverished environments where unresolved trauma is all too common.
